

ALUMNI AND SCHOOL NOTES.

The sixth volume of the new edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, which has just appeared, contains two articles by members of the Law School faculty. Judge Baldwin writes that on "Law in the United States," which forms a sub-division of the general title Law, edited by Lord Davey. Professor Woolsey contributes to that on the Monroe Doctrine, and concludes his sketch of its history in these words:

"Never having been formulated as law, or in exact language, the Monroe Doctrine has meant different things to different persons at different times. It has grown with the consciousness of growth in power,—a curious fact, since it is founded on the right of defending interests which must be less endangered as the United States becomes greater. It has become deeply rooted in the American heart, and a permanent part of the foreign policy of the United States. It tends to change into the principle that every portion of the American Continent must be free from European control. It is still coupled, however, with the converse principle that America takes no part in European politics, as the disclaimer of the American delegates to the Peace Conference at The Hague proved."

Professor Rogers has an article in the initial number of the American Law School Review on "Legal Education in the United States."
